The point of departure for most recreationists is not the most remote and beautiful location in the world, but rather a location that happens to be close to home. Many people choose an area near home for no other reason than because it is close and easy to get to. There is usually nothing very difficult about getting there. No mountains or jungles or other wild country, no unusual plants or animals, no white water rivers, and no snow. This is why so many people choose recreation locations near home. Still, it is often argued that the closer the location, the more ideal it is for the average person. Well, some people may have a broader definition of ideal than others. For many people, proximity to a home or family is not all that it's cracked up to be. There are many areas in America that are at least a day's drive from any major population centers. They are called the back country. Perhaps the most remote areas in North America that are still accessible are the mountains of northwestern Colorado. The Park Range and the Flat Tops in eastern Washington, the Granite Mountains in southeastern Oregon, and the Kaibab Plateau in northern Arizona are some of the back country that is ideal for recreation and vacationing. These are locations that are difficult to get to, where traveling by car is not that easy, and where there are fewer people. The National Park Service Designation of Large Parks and Wilderness Areas is now under way. Many of these newly created areas are already highly popular. For example, many of these areas are already well-used by hikers, campers, boaters, anglers, and other visitors. These lands are often designated as wilderness areas or large parks, so that people can use them without worrying that they will disturb other visitors, that the Park Service will be obligated to protect and maintain the lands. In some cases, these lands are popular enough to have lakes, rivers, and streams, and sometimes even national forest land. One of the really remote back country locations in the Colorado Rockies is the Absaroka Beartooth Wilderness Area. It is about four hundred miles east of Billings, Montana. There are trails that allow people to hike in this wilderness area. The hike to the top of the mountain is probably longer than the hike to the top of Pikes Peak, but the views are just as good. 82157476af
